Forward/Introduction

Sculpture Now: 10 Virginians was conceived for a number of reasons. First and foremost was the desire to provide the citizens of Danville and southwest Virginia with the opportunity to view a sampling of some of the most daring and original sculpture being produced today by contemporary artists from across the state.

The second reason, which is of equal importance, was to provide an avenue of support to the artists themselves through recognition, documentation and exposure. As the least understood of all the fine art mediums, sculpture has traditionally been under-valued, under-appreciated and under-exposed. To compound matters, sculptors are confronted with production costs unknown to artists working in two-dimensional formats, not to mention the logistical problems and costs associated with transporting their works plus the ultimate realization that new-age sculpture rarely sells. To persevere under these conditions requires strength and steadfast determination. This exhibition is a tribute to the sculptor.

Next, the exhibit was organized with the intention of making the statement that small museums and art centers with limited resources can produce important and viable exhibition programs given the support of state and federal agencies and the encouragement of governing boards, memberships and the community at large.

Finally, this exhibit was intended as a means of introduction. Having recently returned to Virginia after an absence of eight years, I was very anxious to become reacquainted with the artists of my home state. A survey show of contemporary sculpture seemed like a good starting point.

In an attempt to locate sculptors to be represented in the show, several museum professionals and institutions across the state were contacted and asked to make recommendations regarding sculptors in their locale. Other sculptors were directly invited to participate based on a prior knowledge of their work seen in other regional shows. A prospectus was also sent out to over 500 artists across the state asking that slides of their work be submitted for consideration. In all cases, participating artists were selected from slides, with individual works being selected by a studio visit.

Emerging into this project, as it were, with only a limited knowledge of what to expect in the form of an aggregate of contemporary sculpture, I chose not to attempt thematic continuity, but stylistic diversity. Consequently, no prerequisites of iconography, style, or process were intended or preferred. Instead the criteria for selecting the artists was loosely based on the desire to include works which were challenging, provocative, visually interesting and "off the beaten track". All this was considered with the frame work of quality, as subjective a concept as that may be. A concerted effort was also made to include sculptors from across the state as opposed to one or two cultural hearth centers.

The featured sculptors represent Virginia's five major cultural/geographical locations defined by the Danville Museum as: Appalachia, northern Virginia, the Richmond/Charlottesville area, the Piedmont(south central) and the Tidewater region. The ten sculptors selected for inclusion in this exhibit are William Bennett, Charlottesville, Steve Bickley, Blacksburg, Myron Helfgott, Richmond, Ellen Henry, Norfolk, Martin Johnson, Virginia Beach, Rebecca Kamen, Arlington, Elizabeth King, Richmond, John McCarty, Delaplane, Paul Munsen, Floyd and Carlton Newton, Richmond. Each artist is represented by two works.

The pieces chosen for this exhibit are representative of each artist's current direction and exemplify today's pluralism in American art when no single style or approach is dominant. The interests of this diverse group of sculptors range from traditional formalist concerns to highly individual formats with an emphasis on the creative and experimental in terms of style, form and content.

If a common denominator exists in this otherwise eclectic exhibition, it would be one of process as all works are "assemblage" sculpture. In the context of this exhibit, "assemblage" is used interchangeably with that of construction and refers to any fabrication process which involves building up forms in an additive way by joining component parts - either pre-formed or found (ready-mades), rather than by carving or modelling an original mass. Regardless of whatever else this collection of works has in common, the process of assemblage provides an ideal departure point for viewing the works in this exhibit.

WILLIAM BENNETT - Artist Statement

My sculptures in this show, Bed of Dreams and Boat over Ocean over Ocean are part of an ongoing series of works that have been evolving for the last 10 years. Themes in this series include birth, death, and sexuality and the emotions of fear and awe with which we approach these moments of intense living. I work by trial and error and follow a personal sense of beauty in hopes of finding combinations and juxtapositions of forms, colors, images, and materials which allow our thoughts to drift below the surface of our daily affairs to a more universal level where our humanity is most clearly revealed. I am not interested in making art which critiques our society or celebrates the mundane. Instead, I would like my work to address these mythic events when we are most aware of being alive.

My recent sculptures make reference to mystical landmarks and ancient sites; human symbols, fire, nature forces and religion are evident. These narrative elements give an additional dimension to the sculpture, yet I struggle to keep my work abstract, personal and original.

ELLEN HENRY - Artist Statement

The artist and architect Alvar Aalto once remarked that wood is the most human material. I agree. A tree is a living being with a circulatory system, heart, limbs, and skin. Cypress trees even have knees! I enjoy working with the spirit and the natural form of the tree, letting these tell me what to make and how to make it. I also enjoy imposing my will on the wood, ignoring the natural structure and instead working from a laminated block. The figures in this exhibition are representative of these two methods of working.

The figures also express my interest in the traditions, motivations and outcomes involved in spiritual journeys. The eyeless, earless head strains upward in a symbol of the inner quest. The male and female figures, representing the animus and anima, are the guides or guardians that traditionally accompany one on such an inner search.

My work has been influenced by two major life experiences: teaching art on the Navajo Indian Reservation in Arizona in 1972; and two lecture trips to China in 1985 and 1987. Living and working with both the Indians and Chinese gave me a unique opportunity to participate in these ancient cultures. Indian artifacts, the designs found in Navajo blankets and jewelry, and the forms and richly patined surfaces of ancient Chinese bronzes, have had a strong influence on my sculpture.

ELIZABETH KING - Artist Statement

My work takes the form of a kind of prolonged inquiry, fueled by fright and amazement, on the coexistence of substance and spirit. I am thinking about who and about what a person is - as a being, as a thing. The figures I make are portraits, but I also address the human body as a working organism, made of stuff, palpable, animate. I imitate, mechanically the way the body moves: flexible spine, rotating shoulders, working fingers and toes, movable eyes. I'm interested in being able to place such an articulated figure in any position in space, and then stand back and look at it. Even in repose, the figure retains its potential for movement. I like that look. I should say that my intent is not for the viewer to manipulate the pieces. My own choice of a position is an important part of the formal presentation of these works. At present, I am carving an all-wood figure, one-half life size, completely movable in all joints including eyes and eyelids.

CARLTON NEWTON - Artist Statement

I have been interested in motion in sculpture, not kinetic art, not necessarily action motion, but the history of motion that allows itself to enter into the imaginary life of the piece. In the beginning I worked with liquid forms, using plaster because it had so many different states of fluidity. Growth by liquid accretion fascinated me. Later, I used simple shapes to sweep out volumes. The shapes, the volumes, and the history of motion made an image. The viewer's recreation of the making of the image created a kind of mental space that became an important part of the sculptures.
